

Setting the Intention for the Session

We are Creator Beings. We either create consciously or unconsciously. It is our choice. Setting an intention for your BQH session allows both you and your client to step into that conscious creator mode together. Creating an intention can help override conflicting and deeply held beliefs (from either the practitioner or client) about any number of things that could possibly and/or inadvertently affect a session.

Is it required to formally set an intention? Of course not, but doing so gives your client the best opportunity for a great session outcome so why wouldn't you?

If you are not familiar with setting intentions, here are some thoughts to consider/examples:

- A well-respected and experienced traditionally-trained, yet skeptical, hypnotherapist might decide to try facilitating a quantum healing session believing that it has little chance of affecting change for his client. His intention (proving it to be ineffective?) may be affected by this belief system and that energy is part of the equation of a BQH session with his client. That energy has the possibility to stall or block some of the client's potential experience.
- A brand-new quantum healer has never facilitated any session before and is about to try for the first time with an eager client who trusts her and the method. This new practitioner has yearned to help others for a long time and is passionately interested in BQH. She and her client both connect their energy fields strongly and set the intention with water alchemy that the client will receive significant answers and information despite having zero QH or hypnosis experience. The outcome is wonderful for both.
- A deeply fundamentalist religious woman comes to have a session because she is in the last stages of an aggressive form of cancer and her doctors have given up and stopped treatment. Her intention is to keep living her life. In her session she goes basically nowhere. She lays down and recalls some memories- her wedding day, the birth of her son. Rewinding time goes nowhere, she has no contact with her Higher Self. She says hardly two words about the session. Yet, within weeks she learns her cancer has spontaneously gone into remission and she resumes her life. (actual session story from my practice)
- A woman comes for a session because another woman seems to be "ruining her life" and marriage. Her initial goal is to find out how to remove this person from her life- basically how to make her just go away. In the session we soften that 3d goal to create the intention for her to understand the purpose of their relationship and change the energy/balance. This instantly healing session showed the client how this other person was integral in assisting her in finding and accepting her own self-worth and power. The client left beaming, her self-worth returned instantly, and her feelings changed to great love and gratitude to this other person. (actual session story from my practice)
